

Fads and Late Fashions

NEW YORK, Oct. 5.—One of the most striking features of the new models exhibited in the shops now is the predominance of the thin soft wools. They are wonderfully light in weight and very beautiful, but they are not easy to handle successfully. Some of the most beautiful and modish of these thick wools are plain or mixed velours de laine, peau de chamois and peau d'agneau, which have soft, chamolike surfaces; cut velours, which is a wool velours in which lines have been cut, exposing a foundation of contrasting color which shows like an undershot pin stripe; tinsel, which is a wool sponge, wool corduroy, a soft thick wool cord like corduroy, sometimes in various new weaves, ratine plain or broché, and pavement block diagonal and striped velours de laine.

There are many other similar materials with countless variations. They are all lovely in texture and coloring, but in spite of all the importers say that these materials, though light in weight, will be too warm for comfort except in very cold weather and will collect dust too readily. Still they are pre-eminent the mode, and while serges, chevrons, corded stuffs of the Bedford cord type and similar tailoring materials are still accepted and correct for the coat and skirt costume, the fad of the moment is the tailored costume of the thicker and softer wool.

Combinations of plain and brocade tulle are new and effective and the use of matelasse in association with plain material is one of the new season's innovations. The effect is not always happy, but in some cases it is exceedingly so, and very handsome costumes have been built up entirely of the matelasse, which looks very much like a particularly handsome brocade silk zenana cloth, though its texture is lighter, softer, and altogether different.

A good deal of fur is used on both frocks and suits, often appearing as a mere touch and in unexpected places. One of the French makers has sent out several very chic models in cut velvet, giving the effect of pin stripe velvet on a chiffon foundation. These models have a neck finish of fur, a very narrow line of skunk or sable running around the front and sides of the bodice neck just at the base of the throat, but oddly dipping down in a slight point at the back.

On evening gowns of the sheerest sort lines of fur border the draperies or finish the little sleeves. There was, for example, a very charming model in one of the importers' collection which was of white tulle over white satin. The short, loose sleeves and shoulders were of fine lace, and from the shoulder yoke simple draperies of tulle were drawn softly into a narrow girdle. The skirt had an overdress of tulle, full around the sides and back, and drawn forward a little toward the front, leaving the satin underskirt in view down to the knees but meeting under a low of tulle at knee height. The surplus drapery and the skirt drapery were bordered narrowly with skunk, and lines of the dark fur entered into the tulle bow on the skirt.

Everything in overdressery that produces a blue wider above the knees than below, that is tucked up or drawn softly away from the front, is duplicated panther drapery, though it may be a very far cry from the panthers of old or even from the panthers of the last spring season. And most of the draped skirts come under this head. The underskirt or four-piece may be very narrow, is at least limp and narrow in effect even when plaited, but the overdressery is full enough to broaden the silhouette a trifle and sometimes it even approaches the bouffant.

There is a good deal of skirt drapery, falling straight, long and clinging on the right side, but caught up in some modified panther puff fashion at the left front, the long line usually including the front and lending height to the figure, while the drapery at the left makes concession to the vogue of drapery movement. A simple cloth frock in blue and black stripes, displayed in one of the shops, showed a pleasing version of this overside drapery arrangement and had a clever unpretentious trimming of tiny black drops set on to simulate a wide band.

There are many smart cloth frocks, all much longer than in the French models than American women are in the habit of wearing. All of them touch the ground, most of them even trail a bit, but as a rule they could be made shorter without losing their grace, an arrangement which would make them suitable for American wearers, who do not like the idea of wearing a trailing skirt on the street.

Long sleeves have beyond question arrived. For that matter, they arrived last season, but only the few took them seriously. Now one sees little else save in models intended for house wear or evening purposes, though occasionally a smart visiting frock has a three-quarter sleeve finished by some sort of soft draped cuff or frill. Soft white waists developed in fancy necks, and hand-made lace and all-overs of fine pattern have elaborate designs worked out in colored satin, tinsel, chiffon and velvet ribbon. Ribbon designs are brought out in relief on the fronts, sleeves and upper portion of the back. Pale blue, yellow, rose or lavender satin is used in tubular style, the filling often being sufficient to give a trimming about the circumference of a pencil.

More delicate designs are worked out in the floral patterns, padded flowers being made of tinsel and chiffon, the rest of the design being worked out in hand embroidery. Small forget-me-not patterns are brought out with small black velvet flowers on white chenille, and silk embroidery is employed to bring out the rest of the design. The color suggestions on white being handworked are particularly effective.

There is a great deal of tulle used in the form of scarfs, shawls, draperies, sleeves and gumples. Metalized tulle is very much favored, and there are certain wraps for evening wear which take the place of scarfs that are entirely of tulle. Wherever it is possible use tulle instead of chiffon.
